Concluding thoughts on the disaster response process are not meant to be prescriptive, but rather to highlight the need for a more holistic and inclusive approach. The process of disaster response is often dominated by a narrow set of actors and interests, which can lead to a lack of transparency and accountability. This is particularly true in the case of large-scale disasters, where the scale and complexity of the response can make it difficult to track and evaluate the actions of various actors. The process of disaster response is also often characterized by a lack of coordination and communication, which can lead to inefficiencies and duplication of effort. This is particularly true in the case of international disasters, where the involvement of multiple countries and organizations can make it difficult to coordinate and communicate effectively. The process of disaster response is also often characterized by a lack of attention to the needs and interests of the most vulnerable populations, which can lead to a lack of equity and justice. This is particularly true in the case of disasters in developing countries, where the resources and capacity to respond to disasters are often limited. The process of disaster response is also often characterized by a lack of attention to the long-term needs and interests of the affected populations, which can lead to a lack of sustainability and resilience. This is particularly true in the case of disasters in urban areas, where the density and complexity of the built environment can make it difficult to address the long-term needs and interests of the affected populations. Notes
1. I would like to thank the organizers of the conference for their invitation to participate. I am particularly grateful to the organizers in New York for their hospitality and for making this chapter possible.
